The Secret Responsibility

Hasan’s college was preparing for a student skills fair, and everyone was busy. Posters were being printed, classrooms were being arranged, and participants were asking many questions in the group chat. Hasan usually helps quietly in college activities, so his English teacher, Ms. Farhana, called him after class.

“Hasan, I need someone reliable,” she said. “Can you help manage the registration forms, the schedule, and communication with the participants?”

Hasan felt proud, but he was also nervous. “I can try, ma’am. I have never managed this much information before.”

“That is why I am choosing you,” she replied with a smile. “You are careful, and you ask questions when you are unsure. If a person checks details, problems become easier to solve.”

For the next two days, Hasan worked with a small team. He collected forms from students who wanted to join the event. He updated a schedule that showed the time for each presentation. He also sent short messages to participants, so everyone knew where they should go. At night, he was still checking names while his friends were watching videos online.

On Thursday evening, Hasan noticed something strange. Two students had the same presentation time, but they were in different rooms. At first, it looked like a small mistake. Then he checked the printed list and felt worried. The wrong schedule had already been shared with twenty participants.

“Oh no,” he whispered. “I have made a mistake.”

For a few minutes, Hasan stared at the screen. A quiet thought came to his mind: maybe nobody will notice. The event is tomorrow, and I am too tired to fix everything now. But another thought was stronger: if I hide this mistake, people may become confused during the event.

He called his classmate Nabil, who was helping with the project. “I found a problem in the schedule,” Hasan said.

Nabil was silent for a moment. “Should we tell Ms. Farhana now?”

Hasan looked at the clock. It was late. “Yes, we must tell her. I do not want the event to suffer because of my mistake.”

He sent a clear message to the teacher and explained what had happened. A few minutes later, she called him. Hasan expected her to be angry, but her voice was calm.

“Thank you for informing me,” she said. “Mistakes happen. Responsibility means you do not run away from them. What solution are you going to suggest?”

Hasan took a deep breath. “We will correct the schedule tonight. Then we will send a new message to all participants. I will also call the two students whose times were mixed.”

The work took almost two hours. Hasan and Nabil checked every name, corrected the list, and wrote a polite update. The new schedule was posted in the group, and the two students were contacted directly. Hasan felt tired, but his mind was lighter.

The next morning, the event started smoothly. Participants arrived in the right rooms, volunteers followed the updated schedule, and the teachers looked pleased. During a short break, Ms. Farhana said, “Hasan, you have shown real accountability. A reliable person is not someone who never makes mistakes. A reliable person is someone who fixes mistakes honestly.”

Hasan smiled. He had learned something important. Leadership is not only about being confident in front of people. It is also about doing the right thing when nobody is watching. By the end of the day, he felt grateful and stronger. He knew that true responsibility grows when a person chooses honesty over comfort.
