The New Beginning

Several months have passed since Hasan first returned the lost wallet to its owner. At that time, he was just a quiet student who was trying to do the right thing. Now, as he walks through the college gate on a bright Thursday morning, he feels that something inside him has changed. The college is organising a programme called “Lessons from Our Journey,” and students are being invited to share what they have learned during their academic journey.

In the auditorium, volunteers are arranging chairs, testing the microphone, and placing name cards on the table. Hasan is going to speak in front of many students and teachers. He feels nervous, but he is not afraid in the same way he was before. He has been trying to become more disciplined, more patient, and more responsible. Today, he wants to speak honestly about that journey.

Robin, his close friend, comes and sits beside him. "You look serious," Robin says with a smile. "Are you ready?" Hasan looks at the small paper in his hand. "I have written the main points, but I don't want to sound perfect. I want to sound real." Robin nods. "That is better. People listen when a speaker shares something meaningful."

While waiting for his turn, Hasan remembers the lost wallet. He could have kept the money, but he returned it. He remembers the exam week when worry almost stopped him from studying. He remembers the missing alarm that taught him to prepare the night before. He also remembers the day when he helped Robin return to better study habits instead of judging him. Each experience was small, but each one gave him a new perspective.

He also thinks about the community service day when students cleaned a public space and organized books for younger learners. At first, some students thought the work was boring, but later they saw how teamwork can create real change. Then he remembers the angry message in the group chat. If he had sent a harsh reply, the project might have been damaged. Instead, he waited, clarified the problem, and learned that respectful communication can protect friendships. Finally, he remembers the registration mistake he admitted during the college event. It was embarrassing, but the problem was fixed because he accepted responsibility.

Soon, a teacher who has guided many students calls his name. Hasan walks to the front. The audience becomes quiet. For a moment, he looks at the faces of his classmates. Some are confident, some are tired, and some are still searching for their direction. He takes a deep breath and begins.

"I used to think success meant only good marks and recognition," Hasan says. "But I have learned that success also means becoming trustworthy, learning from mistakes, helping others, and staying hopeful when life feels difficult. If we remember only our results, we will forget the character that helped us reach them."

He continues, "I have made mistakes. I have felt overwhelmed. I have blamed others when I should have checked myself first. But those moments were not useless. They were lessons. If I were still the same careless student, I would probably avoid responsibility. Now I understand that growth is not a sudden accomplishment. It is a lifelong journey."

A few students look at one another and smile. Hasan feels calmer. "We should be grateful for the people who correct us kindly," he says. "We can improve when we accept advice with humility. We must also support friends who are struggling, because a small act of encouragement may become a turning point in someone's life."

After the speech, the hall fills with warm applause. The principal thanks Hasan and says, "Your words remind us that education is not only information. It is also transformation." Hasan feels grateful, not because he gave a perfect speech, but because he spoke from experience.

Later, as the program ends, Robin walks beside him across the campus. "So, what is next?" he asks. Hasan looks at the open sky above the college field. "I am going to keep learning," he replies. "I will still make mistakes, but I will try to correct them faster. My aspiration is not to look successful only from outside. I want to become useful, honest, and steady from inside."

The afternoon sunlight falls on the empty chairs as the students leave the auditorium. Hasan folds his speech paper and puts it in his bag. He knows that one chapter of his student life has taught him many lessons, but another chapter is waiting. With gratitude in his heart and hope in his steps, he walks forward into a new beginning.
